

Greyhound Racing in West Virginia

Subsidies for a dying industry

There are two operational greyhound tracks in West Virginia: Wheeling Island in Wheeling and Mardi Gras in Cross Lanes. An antiquated state law requires these gambling facilities to hold hundreds of races per year in order to offer other, more profitable forms of gambling.

Gambling on live dog racing in West Virginia declined by 57% between 2010 and 2023, following a decades-long national trend. In November 2018, Florida citizens voted to end greyhound racing by a decisive vote of 69% to 31%. Commercial dog racing is now illegal in 44 states.

Under the state dog racing mandate, roughly $17 million in state gambling revenues must also be used to subsidize races every year. These funds could instead be used for important state programs like education, health care or improving our roads. A large percentage of these subsidies are paid out to greyhound breeders living in other states.

A caged greyhound at the Mardi Gras dog track in West Virginia, 2014.

Greyhounds endure lives of confinement

More than 1,500 greyhounds are kept in warehouse style-kennel compounds in West Virginia. During the month of June 2022, a total of 554 dogs raced at Mardi Gras and 889 at Wheeling. At these compounds, dogs are kept in rows of stacked metal cages for long hours each day, with shredded paper or carpet remnants for bedding. State regulations require just a minimum cage size of 44 inches long, 32 inches wide, and 34 inches high, and do not limit the amount of time greyhounds can be left confined.

Greyhounds suffer serious injuries

From 2015 to 2024 there were 5,647 greyhound injuries reported at West Virginia dog tracks. More than 1,800 dogs suffered broken bones during this period, and at least 123 greyhounds died after suffering serious injuries.

Other animal welfare problems

Since 2007 the state has issued rulings in more than 900 disciplinary cases, including over 100 drug violations and nineteen cases related to animal abuse or neglect. Rulings include multiple cases of licensees hitting greyhounds, a broken-legged greyhound who did not receive medical treatment for days, and poor kennel conditions.

Female greyhounds are routinely given methyltestosterone, an anabolic steroid, to prevent a loss of race days. This performance enhancing drug is prohibited in other dog racing jurisdictions, but continues in West Virginia.

Greyhounds are fed raw "4-D" meat from dying, diseased, disabled and dead animals. This meat is used to reduce costs, despite the serious health problems known to be associated with it.